A Brief History of the Lore Council and the Matriarchs – The Plans of Tarathas

And so it came to pass that the great Lore Council of the Meer was the governing body of the lands of Ishpuria, our home. It was during this time that a group came to power who concealed their intentions and hid them from our populace and our Matriarchs, whom were to oversee the Lore Council's decisions and actions. One Meer, an Elder who went by the name of Tarathas of Ishpur, was a particularly ambitious lot and had taken his time in consolidating a power base for himself and in finding a specific relic of our world, the so called Crystal Lattice of Anjur.
With this artifact he then divined the locations of the nexus's of power within Ishpuria and sought to control them, utilizing forbidden and sealed magic that should never have been available to any but the Matriarchs. Despite the Matriarchs wisdom, it is often seen that they had grown inactive and passive at the time, which is speculated as to the reason that none of this was found out until a chance encounter with a Jukan scoutinng team occurred.

An incursion force of Jukans had been devastated in a battle, and the few survivors were severely wounded. The Jukans prepared to fight the scout they had encountered but the scout, a low ranking soldier by the name of Shedana, challenged the ranking Jukan officer, Sikuth, to a White Duel. Shedana says that the terms of the White Duel were that if the Jukans were to win, they would be taken to their clan with no questions asked and any mortal wounds treated, while if Shedana were to win they would offer their information and go along quietly as prisoners. Sikuth faced off against Shedana, and despite Sikuth's wounds purportedly fought Shedana to a near standstill before the scout managed to defeat the Jukan. Sikuth then related to Shedana that they had been passing through Meer lands to attempt to retrieve an Adept of the Way who had been captured some weeks before when they stumbled upon a group of Ishpurian Mages at a glade, whose leader was none other than Councilman Tarathas of Ishpur. After a fierce battle in which the Jukans slew many of Tarathas' companions, Tarathas managed to drive them off into retreat. Sikuth said that as they fled they were aware of a huge release of magical power from the location of the glade that Tarathas had driven them away from.

It is at this point that speculation rises once more, as it's difficult to tell whether this was the second or the first of the three nexus points that Tarathas had secured, and if the answer could be found a great deal of blame could be laid to rest. The majority of scholars believe that this was his first nexus captured, and had the Matriarchs come to the decision to act more swiftly that they could have stopped him at the forgotten swamps. Unfortunately it's difficult to tell if this is a legitimate accusation due to insufficient evidence. What we do know is that with his ploy discovered, the Matriarchs immediately had the other members of the Lore Council held in custody while they sent their agents to attempt to track down Tarathas. The agents of the Matriarchs were baffled and left clutching straws by their cunning adversary, however, and by the time they had arrived at the nexus point of the glade and the nexus point of the forgotten swamps, both had already been corrupted and drained of their powers. The final nexus point was unknown to the Matriarchs but they were able to follow Tarathas' own investigative techniques to realize that it lay beneath the great abandoned city of Anjur. Using the power at their command, the Matriarchs traveled to the city with a large force of mages, scouts, and hunters to deal with whatever forces that Tarathas could

time to take Tarathas to task for what he had planned, and prevent catastrophe.
